National Public Lands Day

This is the largest hands-on volunteer effort to preserve America's lands, National Public Lands Day. This event takes place in September and provides an opportunity to spend a fall day outdoors at Mark Twain Lake, meet friends, laugh, joke and have fun while making public land a better, safer, and more beautiful place. The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers at Mark Twain Lake plan activities that contribute to this national effort within partnerships with White Tails Unlimited, Quails Unlimited, Missouri Department of Conservation and Forrest Keeling Nursery. Also, area individuals, families, civic organizations, school organizations, youth organizations, clubs, and church groups are always welcome to participate and contribute time and effort to develop these natural resource projects. Work focuses on wildlife habitat management activities in the Frank Russell Recreation Area. Tree planting, shrub/travel corridor planting, food plot planting, bunny ranch house building, and prairie grass plantings are among this year's projects. Other areas of work involve shoreline clean-up. The recent high water at the lake has resulted in numerous tires, household trash, and other large items being scattered along the shoreline. If a clean shoreline is important to you, please come and help.
